By SAMUEL HOPKINS ADAMS.

John Smith wants a watch. Being, like most of us, human enough to have a touch of vanity in his make-up, he wants a sightly and presperous appearing watch. Gold is in his mind's eye; a gold watch of a reliable movement, properly jewelled. But John himself is none too prosperous. The money saved for the watch represents no small selfdenial and abstinence from other desirable purchases. Therefore he wants the very best value for his money. Now, John would never consider going to one of the fashionable Fifth Avenue jewelry shops, to a high-class department store, or even to one of the small, honest "neighborhood" type of jewelry shops. These he would believe quite out of his range of price. Here he would make his fatal error, for at any of these places he would get an honest deal, know exactly what he was buying, and have a sound guarantee back of his purchase. But the superstition of the watch "bargain" is in his mind. So he will go further and fare worse, and we will follow him on this search of his for fairy gold; a fictitious search for the purposes of this article, but one which has been paralleled in every particular by the experiences of The Tribune investi-

Exploring, with an alert regard, the field of East Twenty-hird Street, John Smith is caught and held, as with a glittering eye, by this sign in the window of the Mathieus Jewelry Co., at No. 52:

SEVEN JEWEL WALTHAM AND ELGIN GOLD FILLED WATCHES. $4.95. VALUE $10.00. GUARANTEED 20 YEARS.

The names of the bargain watches are familiar to him as those of standard makes. He goes in and asks to see a Waltham watch. The obliging saleswoman produces a genuine (but very old) Waltham, and while the customer is looking it over she deftly switches his attention to a Waldron watch. Now Waltham and Waldron are not quite nearly enough alike to involve conflict with the trademark laws, but they have sufficient resemblance when spoken trippingly on the tongue to fool the unwary. Let us give the saleswoman the benefit of the doubt and concede that she did not use the term "Waltham" precisely, but-

Smith's attention is readily diverted from the first article shown. To enough to be guaranteed for five years, but is stamped "20-year guarhigh lustre—dark and medium antee."

Yard wide Faille Taffetas—very soft—high lustre—dark and medium antee."

On the Bowery our Mr. Smith might learn a further lesson in the

"It's a twenty-year hunting case," she assures him. "Look. Here's Sure enough, there is the legend, "Warranted twenty years," but it is stamped on the inner face of the outside case, instead of on the inside cap where it should be, thus suggesting that the stamping was done, not by the manufacturer of the case (the Illinois Watch Case Company). know this. If he did he wouldn't be such an easy, 'Seven-jewelled movement, too," continues suggests a rich and superior article. Some doubt, however, lingers. "If this gets out of order can I send it to the Waltham Company, and will they repair it?" he asks.

That helps catch John Smith. The mere sound of the word "jewellcd"

(This exact query was put to the saleswoman at the Mathieus store, and the reply was identically as I give it below in the supposititious conversation with Smith.)

make which will last him twenty years, Smith puts down his $4.95. And this is what he gets for it:

The movement is an old one, manufactured by a defunct concern with the Trans-Siberian Railroad; and apparently made on some cheap education, rather expensively, in the subject of "queer" timepieces. But Petticoats Drawers special order, as it is not regular in any of its parts. Its seven jewels if he or any other of the Smith or human tribe wishes to get fair value which glittered so brightly to the imaginative eye of Smith dwingle in the watch market he will do well to beware of the following tricks of down on examination to one lone sparkler-and that a glass one! The the trade: case is a five-year case, not a twenty-year case, and the "Warranted twenty years" is a plain falsity. Under the law the Illinois Watch Case Company becomes liable for the stamped statement, as the case is registered by them, although it would appear from the location of the legend that not they, but the jobber or dealer, may have stamped it upon the case. Three dollars and fifty cents would be a fair retail price for the very poor jewelling for a watch, example of the watchmaker's art.

In the downtown store of Mathieus, at 243 Broadway, our friend Smith would have done rather better. There, if he had tried to get an Elgin for $5, represented as a fifteen-jewel movement with twenty-year ranting" of 5-year cases for 20 years. case, he would actually have been sold an Elgin. But it would be the movement, and not the case, that was of the twenty-year variety; and the kind asked for.

This time Smith, having just found a job with a railroad, is after a somewhat higher class watch, for a railroad man's timekeeper must keep time, not approximate CITY IN BUSINESS, it. Clair's sunburst effect in show windows catches Smith's eye, and he enters, to find himself met by the super-blonde lady who some time since sold me the alarm clocks.

"Railroad watch?" she repeats. "That's got to pass the inspection. Low Plan Assailed as Permitting You got to have a good watch to do that. It must have at least seventeen jewels."

"Well, I want a good watch, but I don't want to go too high."

"Something about $35 or $40?"

"Too much. I can't afford it." "Well, here's one you can have for $30."

"Haven't you got anything cheaper? I've just landed this job and I can't afford to go high."

Thereupon she shows him several watches, including a Swiss make which no American railroad would allow, and several others under the phrase providing that municipalities Netcong, N. J., Aug. 14.—Peter Benstandard requirements, and he finally settles on an Elgin movement in a shall have power to manage their own son, of this place, has a pear tree with case stamped "20-year guarantee." No price tag appears on this article. besiness affairs opened the door to pears on one side and blossoms on "How much?" inquires John Smith.

"Brand new. Guaranteed. Give me thirteen and a half for it."

"Twelve is my limit."

"My husband would kill me if he ever knew I let it go at that price. But, there," she sighs. "Give me the money and take it." John Smith takes it. Whether or not he brings it back after finding CUSTOMERS FIRST.

that the railroad company's watch inspector will not pass it depends upon the percentage of optimism and courage in his character. The timepiece is-or was-a good enough cheap Elgin watch. It is not "brand new," but ten years old at least. It has only seven jewels, is hunting case not open face, as the railroads demand, is not lever-set as required by the railroads, and is far below railroad standards. An expert would teil John Smith that to charge $12 for the watch was outrageous. (Such is the opinion of The Tribune's appraiser on this article.) If the watch were new, $7 would be a fair retail price. The case is not a twenty-year 40-inch Radium Taffetas soft and lus-Smith's attention is readily diverted from the first article shown. On the Bowery our Mr. Smith might learn a further lesson in the specious matter of mechanism by purchasing a chronometer from Marmezin & Moskewsky, at 521/2 of that classic and almost but not quite reformed thoroughfare, represented to be a 17-jewelled watch, but set 40-inch Crepe de Chines-broken down on the sales slip as 11-jewelled. Or again, Smith might discover some interesting examples of the art of jewelling machinery by calling on Walter & Co., 182 Broadway, and asking to see some of the Waltham and Elgin watches so temptingly displayed in the window. He wouldn't see those watches (unless he were more fortunate or more persistent than The Tribune purchasers), but he would see, at the urgent invitation of the salesman, an "Admiral" watch, ties only Substantial savings due seven jewelled, at $4.50; and perhaps purchase it, lured by the sparkling to present price cuts—sizes and styles "You can either send it to them, or bring it to us and we'll fix it display within.
